Patrick Marsh Director of Museum Design

Patrick Marsh is the creative genius behind the incredible animatronics and exhibits of the Answers in Genesis' Creation Museum. He is a world-renowned art director whose designs include the popular Jaws and King Kong attractions at Universal Studios in Florida.

For more than 35 years, Marsh's skills and expertise redefined quality and craftsmanship in projects such as the coordination of 50 designers for the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles and the dramatic unveiling of the refurbished Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor in 1986.

Marsh earned his bachelor's degree in industrial design and his master's degree in environmental design from the University of California Los Angeles. Before joining the Creation Museum staff, Marsh was the director of design for Dream Makers in Japan. There, he was responsible for the total concept design of various theme parks including script-writing, art direction, scenic design and architectural design.

Patrick and his wife Sakae, whom he met and married in Japan, live near the museum in northern Kentucky.

Joe Boone Director of Advancement

Joe Boone joined Answers in Genesis (AiG) in September 2006 as the organization's first Director of Advancement and has already become one of its most effective spokespersons. Previously, he served as president and part-owner of a fire truck manufacturing business in Indiana, where more than 1,000 fire-fighting vehicles were built under his leadership. In addition, Boone spent time serving as a volunteer fireman with his local fire department.

Boone heard AiG President Ken Ham speak in 1996 during a very difficult time in his personal life shortly after his wife was diagnosed with a brain tumor. Now a widower raising two children, Boone credits AiG with helping him and his two children have a biblical understanding of why there is death and suffering in the world.

Prior to his involvement in the fire-fighting industry, Boone practiced as a licensed Certified Public Accountant and was a manager with a large CPA firm in Indianapolis.
